We just received a consignment that hibernated in storage for over a quarter century that belonged to a collector of signed material.

Here are several items from that collection: the 1922 definitive edition of "The Writings of Mark Twain." While the set is not complete, having 31 of the 37 required volumes, it does have volume one signed by both Mark Twain and Albert Bigelow Paine. Other first signed editions from this consigner include Henry Miller (1952) "Remember to Remember," Philip Roth (1980) "A Philip Roth Reader," Aldous Huxley (1929) "Leda," William S. Hart (1919) "Pinto Ben and Other Stories," E. L. Doctorow (1971) "The Book of Daniel," Stephen Spender (1936) "The Burning Cactus," Lafcadio Hearn (1950, limited edition) "A Drop of Dew," and W. Somerset Maugham (1944) "The Razor's Edge."

For the lover of art consider Bruce Weber's (2014) "Detroit Has Been Good To Me," and several other volumes of his photography, Aldous Huxley (1960) "On Art & Artists," signed in dj and Ireland (1965) "The Works of George Inness" An Illustrated Catalogue Raisonne," to name of few.

History readers should be attracted to: Gavin (1947) "Airborne Warfare," by the commanding general of the 82nd Airborne, Hub Zemke (1988) "Zemke's Wolf Pack," and O'Brien (1918) "Outwitting the Hun: My Escape from a German Prison Camp." All are signed first editions. Also consider a limited edition of Moore (1926) "Sailing Ships of War 1800 - 1860," and a first edition "Recollections of the Early Days of the National Guard comprising the Prominent Events in the History of the Famous 7th Regiment: N.Y. Militia," published in 1868.

Add to this a touch of murder and mayhem with a copy of Von Feuerbach (1846) "Narratives of Remarkable Criminal Trials," Whittington-Egan (1975) "A Casebook on Jack the Ripper," inscribed to crime mystery writer K. Hale and Taylor (1883) "The Principles and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence," with the bookplate of Richard D. Muir considered the "greatest" prosecutor for the British Crown at the time and you have the making of an enjoyable evening.
